

Defending our Heritage

East Fort's 'new' Gun Pit with one of the eight 18 pounder c.1752 cannon now fitted with blocks and tackle so that it can be "run out" before firing. Hauling the 2.5 ton gun into position is a great challenge and thrill for our visitors, never to be forgotten. A wonderful heritage project which we

A brief history of Hout Bay & Llandudno

The first known inhabitants of the Hout Bay area date back to the late stone age, up to 2000 years ago, and there is evidence of human occupation between 100 and 500 AD. The Hottentots and Bushmen (collectively known as the Khoisan) were their descendants and were the first known fishermen of Hout Bay.

Shortly after van Riebeeck landed at the Cape in 1652 he visited Hout Bay and proclaimed the forest there as being the 'finest in the world'. It was he who gave it the name Houtbaaitjen (The Bay of wood). Subsequent developments and interesting aspects of Hout Bay and Llandudno are: The first written account of Hout Bay dates back to 1607 when John Chapman, Master's Mate of the English boat Consent was sent in to the bay to assess its potential as a harbour, and Chapman's Chaunce was the first name given to Hout Bay. His name is perpetuated as Chapman's Peak Drive, opened in 1922.

The Cape of Storms has been aptly named and has caused numerous shipwrecks around the Hout Bay and Llandudno coastline over the past many years. Two large anchors from the SS Maori, which was wrecked off Hout Bay in 1909 are mounted on the Main Road into Hout Bay, just below the Museum and form an appropriate landmark.

The residential development of Llandudno is on the site of a farm called Sands (later called Klein Kommetjiebaai) granted to van Helsdingen in 1824. The name Llandudno was later adopted at the suggestion of the then chairman's wife who had visited the Welsh seaside resort and was struck by the similarity in topography.

Hout Bay's River and Wetlands

The Disa River is the only remaining one rising from Table Mountain which has not been canalised in concrete. The Trust has embarked on a successful long term project to rehabilitate the entire river corridor ultimately to link Hout Bay with the new Cape Peninsula National Park.

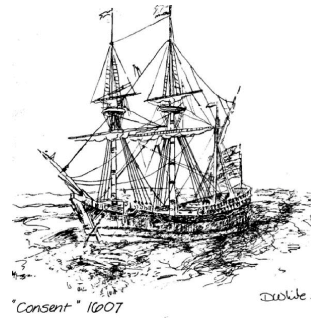

Hout Bay's Military History

War broke out between the Netherlands and England in 1781 following the alliance between Holland and France. Realising the strategic potential of Hout Bay as a landing place for the enemy, the French built the East and West Forts, the Klein Gibraltar battery and a signal post at Constantia Nek to guard the entry to the Bay.

East and West Fort Project

The Trust is currently engaged in the further establishment of a Fynbos Garden of remembrance at East Fort and work will soon commence on the maintenance and restoration of some of the historic precincts. This exciting and ambitious project will mark the start of what could be a landmark step towards the realisation of Heritage Tourism for Hout Bay, hitherto untapped. The eight East Fort cannons will be fully restored eventually making East Fort probably the oldest working coastal battery in the world a wonderful goal for us to set our sites on.
